Many American consumers are still very interested in knowing which grapes can be found in the various French wine regions. To this end, we will seek. Like the largest wine region in France, Bordeaux offers a great diversity in terms of both types of cultivated grapes and wine styles. French wine can become quickly complicated, so we will start with the bases. The main red wines of Bordeaux are built on mixtures of three main grapes: Cabernet Sauvignon, Merlot and Cabernet Franc. The white wines of the region are mainly made up of Sauvignon Blanc and Semillon, both for the dry bone delights and for the famous Sauternes desserts. A river crosses Bordeaux, nicknamed the swarm that forks in the dordogne and garonne rivers. The rivers are important, but as if the banks of the river bring even more notorious. These are the banks of the river, simply called "Banca del Left" (west of the Gironde) and "Right Bank" (east of the Gironde) that bring the keys to understand a lot of Bordeaux. Central bank The wines tend to munch on more heavily in Merlot for the final mixtures, while the wines of the Left Bank often bring more cabernet sauvignon to the bottle. Geography plays a key factor in the purchase of Bordeaux, looking for Right Bank, Merlot bottles? Then know some names of the village that are on the right bank. Villages such as St. Emilion, Pello, Fronsac, and many of the "Cotees de Bordeaux" labels are planted on the right bank. Left bank wines: go for cabernet sauvignon? Then, know a handful of villages that will appear on the labels of the bottle from the left bank. Villages such as Medoc, Saint Estephe, Pauillac, Saint-Julien, Haut-Medoc, and the ultra-foam Margaux. Two other bordeaux-based districts that have become important for both Value prices that for the surprising 50/50 mixture of Merlot and Cab are Graves and Pessac-Leognan. The state chateau state of Bordeaux produces some of the most collectible wines in the world. GettyImages | Esperanza33 If Bordeaux is the king of French wine, then Burgundy is queen. Regal in form, fashion, and reputation, this renown wine region can throw some complicated classification systems and tricky appellations on the bottle, but keep in mind that Burgundy rides on the back of only two key grapes. Keeping it Simple: Pinot Noir (aka "Red Burgundy") and Chardonnay (aka "White Burgundy"), represent a daring vineyard duo that builds the best of Burgundy. Unfortunately, that's often where the simplicity ends for Burgundy. Making it Complicated: This small, but esteemed 100-mile region can be masked in complicated layers of classifications (Village wines, Premier Cru, Grand Cru) and an ongoing system of appellations, regions, communes, and vineyard designations. Where to start? For white wine introductions, look towards the AOCs of Cote de Beaune, Macon, Macon-Villages, Pouilly-Fuisse and Chablis on bottle labels. The Cote de Nuits hinges heavily on Pinot Noir production, as does Mercury, and Givry. The wines of Burgundy are characteristically dry, and terroir-driven with specific expression found within minute sections of vineyards, locally called "clos," which impart a piece of place to the wine. Expect moderate amounts of alcohol and acidity in the bottle, with red wines carrying low to medium levels of tannin and restrained oak influence. The region is planted to about 60% Chardonnay. Since the time of Napoleon, Burgundy's vineyards have been sub-divided between generational heirs and today this slicing and dicing of vineyard land has left much of the area highly fragmented in terms of ownership. For example, a family may own several rows in a vineyard that is easily split between 50 or more owners. In certain appellations, cooperatives play a critical role in managing the production of both the land and ultimately the wine.
